

Families can make a floral time capsule by drying meaningful flowers, adding notes and photographs, and sealing everything in a sturdy container. Choose a date to open it at a future reunion, and make sure several relatives know where it is stored.

Choose flowers with a connection

Start with flowers that have a story the family wants to remember. They might come from a garden where relatives gather, a bouquet on the reunion table, or a plant grown by someone who cannot attend. A flower does not need a grand meaning to belong. A small daisy picked beside the picnic table can recall the afternoon just as well.

Ask each household to contribute a flower or suggest one to represent a memory. Check that everyone has permission to pick from a garden, and avoid collecting plants from protected areas. If fresh flowers are hard to bring, a drawing or photograph can stand in for them.

Preserve the flowers first

Fresh flowers contain moisture and can decay inside a closed container. Press small, fairly flat blooms between sheets of absorbent paper inside a heavy book. Change the paper if it becomes damp, and allow the flowers to dry completely before packing them. This can take several weeks, so start before the reunion if possible.

Another option is to hang small bunches upside down in a dry, airy place, away from direct sunlight. Dried flowers are fragile, and their colors may fade. Keep them away from food and drinks while everyone handles them, and use a shallow box to carry them to the gathering.

Add the family stories

Set out paper and pens beside the flowers. Someone might write that the roses came from the garden by the back steps, where everyone stopped to take pictures. Another person could describe the cake on the table or the song that played while cousins cleared the plates.

Label each flower with its name if known, the date, and the person who contributed it. Add a printed group photograph, a copy of the reunion invitation, or a note from a relative who could not be there. Keep original photographs and irreplaceable letters elsewhere, and put copies in the capsule instead.

Pack it and make an opening plan

Place pressed flowers between clean sheets of paper or in paper envelopes. Cushion dried stems so they do not shift, then arrange the flowers and notes in a clean, dry, airtight container. A rigid box inside the container can help protect delicate pieces from being crushed.

Store the capsule indoors in a cool, dry place rather than burying it, where water and temperature changes can damage the contents. Write the packing date and intended opening date on the container. Tell several relatives where it is, and record the plan with the reunion information.

At the next gathering, opening the capsule can be as simple as passing the envelopes around the table and reading the notes aloud.

Have a look at flowers around the world