Students rely on their phones for lectures, banking, bus times, group chats and two-factor logins, which makes a smashed screen far more than a cosmetic annoyance. The problem is that term-time budgets are tight, and replacing a handset can feel impossible. A repair is almost always cheaper, and at Free Fusion in Corby student phone screen repair begins with iPhone screens from £24.99, a fraction of what a new handset costs.

Before you part with any money, work out whether the phone is worth fixing. If it is a few years old and otherwise runs well, replacing only the screen usually makes more sense than buying a new device. If the battery drains quickly or the charging port is loose, it may be worth asking about those at the same visit, since the phone will already be open. Our diagnostic check is free for local customers, so you can find out everything that is wrong before deciding how much to spend.

Deadlines do not wait, so speed counts. Most smartphone screen and battery replacements at the Corby centre take about an hour, which means a phone can often be fixed between a morning commitment and an afternoon one. Back it up first if it still turns on, ideally to iCloud or Google, so that coursework, photos and authenticator apps are safe. Bring your passcode, and if you use an Apple ID or Google account that locks the device, make sure you can sign in. Protecting the new screen is the cheapest way to avoid paying twice. A snug case and a tempered glass protector cost very little compared with a repair, and they suit the knocks of bags, lecture halls and shared student kitchens.

Students who are home from university for the holidays can make good use of the break by getting devices checked, and those studying elsewhere in the UK can post a phone or tablet to us through Royal Mail or DPD, where mailed devices are typically tested and dispatched the same day they arrive. Laptops matter just as much to a student, and we repair screens, keyboards, batteries and charging ports on MacBooks and Windows machines. Repairs are backed by a warranty, so you can get back to work with confidence. Keep a record of your passcodes somewhere safe, and avoid leaving the only copy of important files on a damaged phone. A repair is far smoother when you are not worrying about what might be lost.
