

The plus-one question is one of the most frequent and most stressful difficulties in party planning. Do you permit partners? Should you not? In what way do you convey your choice without upsetting anyone?

The team at Kollysphere, we have managed this tricky question countless times, and we have created a pragmatic framework for dealing with plus-ones with sensitivity.

What to Think About When Deciding on Plus-Ones

First. Venue Capacity

The most practical consideration is location maximum. Should your venue can comfortably fit 50 people and you have 50 visitors on your register, significant others merely cannot be accommodated.

2. Financial Considerations

Every extra guest increases to your expense — cuisine, drink, seating, and favours. If your budget is restricted, you may need to limit partners.

Third. How Well You Know Them

Consider how close you are to each guest. Near friends and family usually deserve a plus-one. Acquaintances <https://kollysphere.com/birthday-party-planner/> may not.

4. Social Dynamics

Consider whether guests will know anyone else at the party. Should a guest will know no one, a plus-one can help them feel more comfortable.

How to Communicate Your Plus-One Policy

1. Be Clear and Direct

Indicate your plus-one approach unambiguously on the invite. For example: "We have reserved two seats in your honour." Alternatively: "We kindly request that this invitation is for the named guest only."

2. Apply the Same Rule to Everyone

The team at Kollysphere recommend applying the identical rule to everyone. Special cases generate resentment and complicate your organisation.

Third. Anticipate Enquiries

A number of guests will ask whether they can bring along a plus-one. Be polite but resolute. For instance: "Unfortunately, we cannot accommodate additional guests due to venue capacity."

4. Consider a Compromise

Should you want to involve partners but are limited by budget or capacity, think about a compromise — such as extending an invitation to significant others only for the late-night portion of the event.
