Termites rarely announce themselves. By Helpful hints the time a Roanoke homeowner notices buckling floorboards or a cloud of winged swarmers near a window, the colony has usually been feeding for months. That is why Perdue Exterminators treats termite work as long term protection rather than a single spray, and why its termite elimination service comes with renewable annual warranties.

The warranty matters because termite pressure in Southwest Virginia never really goes away. Eastern subterranean termites live in the soil across the Roanoke Valley, and the warm, damp months give them plenty of pest control company Roanoke opportunity to find a foundation crack, a wood to soil contact point or a leaky downspout. Treating once and walking away leaves a home exposed the following season. Renewing the warranty each year keeps a professional set of eyes on the structure and keeps the protection in place.

How the Process Starts

Every job begins with an inspection. Perdue's licensed exterminators look at the home's environment and construction to work out where termites are getting in and what is drawing them there. Crawl spaces, porches, sill plates, slab edges and any wood touching soil all get checked. From there the team recommends a course of action aimed at stopping the problem at the source so it does not keep coming back. Homeowners can call for a free estimate before committing to treatment.

Termites multiply quickly, so delay costs money. A colony left alone through one Roanoke summer can do real structural damage to joists and framing, and repairs often cost far more than prevention. Technicians on the Perdue team, including termite specialists with decades in the field, have seen what years of unchecked feeding can do to older Roanoke homes, and they would much rather catch it early.

There are also simple things homeowners can do between visits. Keep firewood stacked away from the foundation, pull mulch back a few inches from siding, clean gutters so water drains away from the house, and fix leaking hose bibs or AC condensate lines that keep soil wet. None of these replace treatment, but they reduce the conditions that attract a colony in the first place. During each warranty renewal, Perdue's technicians can point out any new risk factors they notice around the property, from a new deck touching soil to a downspout that has come loose.
