

Fresh flowers can decorate a newborn's nursery if they are kept out of the crib and beyond the baby's reach. Choose a stable spot, keep the water clean, and move the arrangement elsewhere if its scent or pollen seems to bother anyone in the room.

Choose a safe place for the vase

A dresser across the room can be a better home for flowers than a shelf above the crib. A vase placed high overhead could fall, and a cloth or trailing stem could be pulled down once a baby begins to reach. Keep the arrangement away from the crib, changing area, and any surface where a caregiver needs clear space.

Think about the small movements that happen during a busy day. A sleeve can catch a vase during a change, or a bag set down on a table can tip it. Choose a sturdy container with a broad base and leave room around it. As your baby grows and starts to grab or climb, check the location again.

Keep flowers, stems, leaves, and vase water out of reach of children and pets. Some plants are poisonous if eaten, and water in a vase is not safe to drink. If you are unsure about a flower or foliage, identify it before bringing it home, especially if a pet can enter the room.

Keep the arrangement fresh

Wash the vase before filling it, use fresh water, and change the water regularly. Remove leaves that would sit below the waterline, and take out flowers as they wilt. If the water looks cloudy or smells unpleasant, empty the vase and wash it before refilling. These simple steps help keep the arrangement clean and limit unpleasant smells.

Some flowers have a strong scent or shed visible pollen. A small, lightly scented arrangement may be easier to live with than a large bouquet beside the rocking chair. If the room smells overpowering, open a window when practical or move the flowers to another room. A clear surface and comfortable air matter more than keeping a bouquet on display.

If your baby has breathing problems or another medical concern, ask your pediatrician for advice about the nursery environment. Seek medical advice if you notice symptoms that concern you rather than assuming flowers are the cause.

Questions about flowers in the nursery

Can flowers go inside the crib?

No. Keep flowers, vases, loose petals, and other decorative objects out of the crib and away from the baby's sleep space.

Are unscented flowers always safe?

Not necessarily. A flower without a noticeable scent still needs to be kept out of reach, and its water and container need regular cleaning.

What if a baby touches or eats part of a flower?

Remove any plant material from the baby's reach. If a baby has eaten a plant, contact your local poison control service promptly and have the plant's name available if possible.

How long should a bouquet stay in the room?

There is no single number of days. Remove it when flowers wilt, the water becomes difficult to keep clean, or the scent is no longer comfortable.

Worth a look: https://kartyonline.net/jak-bezpiecznie-kupowac-i-zamawiac-prezenty-online-na/